Pollinator Symposium

Pollinator Interactions Worldwide

Wednesday, October 18, 2006
8:00 am to 3:30 pm

USDA Jefferson Auditorium

USDA South Building, 14th and Independence Avenue SW
Smithsonian station on the Blue/Orange line. Registrants must enter through 5th wing entrance

FREE! Pre-Registration required. Government Issued Photo ID (such as driver's license) required for entry.

REGISTER NOW! Registration form and agenda at www.pollinator.org.

RSVP: By October 12.

WHAT: A one day symposium for agricultural interests; policy makers; Congressional and Embassy representatives; public and private land management; foundations; conservation, environmental and wildlife organizations; natural resource professionals, mining and utility management; gardening, landscaping and botanic garden interests; golf, recreation and hunting interests; environmentally engaged faith-based groups; corporate organizations; industry; builders, planners and those interested in sustainable development.

WHY: Pollinators are critical to human survival. The interactions between animal pollinators (bees, birds, bats, butterflies, beetles and flies) and flowering plants—essential to the human food chain as well as terrestrial ecosystems—are showing signs of peril.

HIGHLIGHTS:

- The Importance of Pollinators—Where Flora and Fauna Meet
- Threats to Pollinator Populations—Food and Forest Security
- A Global Effort—International Collaborations and North America's Interests
- Managing Resources—Partnering with Agriculture, Forestry, Corporations
- Public Interest and Support—People, Plants and Pollinators
- USPS Pollination Stamp Series—New! Participants will receive a commemorative program featuring the pollinator stamp art.
